1 Introduction

Welcome to the realm of Aeltas—where the relics of ancient deities entwine around steeples of floating cities and the thunder of mana-powered engines reverberates through ancient ruins. This is not only a realm of fantasy; it is a world that breathes and lives—a world forged from tails, steam, and the light of the stars.

In a world that is not Aeltas, history is not a whisper of the past, history in Aeltas is a realm that accompanies the known world in its full glory. A world entwined with a wonder of fantasy, steam-powered citadels, magic war machines, and clerics that wish to call forth avatars through sacrificial hymns. There is a spirited magic to the world of Aeltas in jump and crank steam machines.

This realm is not passive for the dwellers. The dwellers would carve their stories echoing through the ages of time telling the tale of their magic or storm weaving of their magic or shouting praises within sanctums that are divine. The realm around celebrates their magic and herculean deeds. The past is an entwined realm that accompanies the known history as a canvas that is sprawled and is waiting to be brushed upon.

Lost within the provinces of Aeltas are its harrowing and heroic wonders. This is a furious world waiting to be explored yet remain godly gentle for the stones speak echoes of history.

2 Geography of Aeltas

Aeltas is not a single land, but four great frontiers — each humming with myth, danger, and destiny.

2.1 Rein Continent

The heartland of Aeltas. The seven city-states, formerly siblings, rivals, now rivals lie sprawling across a fractured landscape within icy tundras, mana-rich mountains, and airship-laden skies. In Glorium, massive forge-citadels spew out arcane smoke, and warriors immerse themselves in self-cauterization runic rituals with red-hot iron. The White Tower Sanctuary located in the crystalline heights shelters floating cities that are serene, devout, untouchable, and ever casting long shadows over the war-torn plains below.

In Aeltas, both progress and prophecy exist simultaneously. Whispering pilgrims claim that the old Rune Paleaces still conceal King Karros' ghost, watching over, and judging those who dare disturb his legacy.

2.2 Silent Wastes

Toward the east, the land slow rots, and the once warm and fertile Silent Wastes now spasm with repulsive magical corruption. Here, the carcass of Essris, the ashen god screams out with cults drawn to divine rot. Twisted god-flesh seen as the remains of barren god as black obelisks and ascendant rivers showcases the grotesque scabs of the corruption.

If one wishes to listen closely enough to the sand, let it be known that it holds whisper secrets untold.

2.3 Azure Isles

Beyond the Endless Ocean, the Azure Isles glint under the tide like shattered glass. From salt and song, coral metropolises have been raised, their towers exhaling fog and prophecy. Stormcallers dance upon bridges laced with lightning, and the Sea God Velora sleeps below the water — or so the priestesses say.

But not all here is divine. Between kelp-choked ruins skulk pirates, searching out Tideforged relics that force the hands of sea and storm. Storms respond to those who would even dare to question.

2.4 Realm of Eternal Night

A place that is both wondrous and wrong. Under ceaseless twilight, this broken land is ageless. Violet auroras cloud the night sky, and silver rivers choke on obsidian stone, and behind dreaming forests slumber the demigods of old. Cities vanish overnight. Memories echo in the mist.

The nomads of Dawn live there. Others call it cursed. Everyone who leaves... leaves changed — or they don't leave at all.

Visual Representation: The map of Aeltas marks more than land — it traces fear, faith, and forgotten wars. Leylines shimmer across the continents like veins. Every city a scar. Every rift, a breath held in anticipation.

3 The Background Stories of the Four Major Regions of Aeltas

3.1 Rein Continent

Rein—cradle of humankind, bastion of elemental legacy.

These areas were full of Primal magic and primal pacts were whispered into being in the Age of Dawn, long before the written histories could be dried on parchment and paper. Loose clans who once scrambled up the frost-covered fangs of the Howling Peaks to sing to the storm gods or drew spirals on forest bark in the dappled silence of the Verdant Vale. Then came Aelno Raynok. His bond with the mysterious Sylthia was no myth—she was the key. From that moment, the tribes of Rein no longer prayed for magic. They commanded it. Mana flowed not from gods but from will.

In the Rune Age, history carves itself into stone and steel. With steel will and a mind as sharp as a honed blade, King Karro III had bound the fragmented lands under the Runic Concord. Behemoths of citadels hummed with the throbbing heart of rune engines, and his Runesmiths thundered like pulsating timepieces along every bourn of the known world. But under blood, empires of power are weak. But when Karros was assassinated, his children the Split Twins wrecked the realm when it fractured into two pieces. Civil war kept pace like the continuous storm that birthed the infamous Rune Wars upon the nation. To this day, the Broken Plains whisper tales of detonations and despair, their soil etched with glowing scars.

Then dawn the Magi-Tech Age—and with it, Rein change.

- Towering forge of the Iron Guild, aglow with rune-fire, crawl across snowfields like slumbering giants awakened, bellowing smoke into the frostbitten heavens.
- From the sky hang alabaster marvels: the White Tower Sanctuary, a floating sanctum poised above glimmering mountain crests, its walls humming with arcane serenity.
- Far beneath you, mana beats like dragonheart blood throughout ruins as old as memory. Overhead, airship stitch with psionic sigils tore at the sky hole, their hulls droning white-noised because of physics better left forgotten.

Rein doesn't just tell its story. It breathes. Every stone, every whispering wind, every crackling rune is a breathless syllable in a story as yet incomplete.

3.2 Silent Wastes

Where Rein was a hotbed of history and magic, the Silent Wastes are about the lack thereof — lack of gods, of mercy, and the lack most of all, of the sound of anything breathing.

Former basin inbetween holding ancient mountains, the cradle was supposedly hushed by the landing of the Starlight Comet; a meteoric scar in myth. The people who live on the wastes feel it, feel the brooding in the still air, the sensation that the land is holding its breath, refusing to acknowledge what once was.

Here, ruins don't crumble. They lurk.

Its prisoners are the damned, the cunning, and the very, very wicked. The stained In the Age of the Fallen, the Wastes are a prison of ash and bone. Once lush kingdoms are nothing more than ages devoured by sand that mutters names as it falls to sleep. Even the sky withholds color—its palette limited to war and mourning.

– The Obsidian Choir are an order of binding mystics who guard the ruins in a state of penitence, their tongues severed to stop prophecy from bleeding into the wind.

— Beneath the dunes, and hidden from a future that needs them, lie the veil engines : machines from straighter and truer days, now scoured by sand and silence.

- And in depths darker than a tomb, something waits neither alive, nor dead, but only for recognition.

The Wastes are not barren. They are guarded-by the silent, by shame, by the ghosts of aspirations too large to be buried.

Travellers who have braved the Wastes rarely return the same. Some lose their voices. Others speak languages no one ever taught them. And some ... no longer cast any shadows.

To map the Silent Wastes is stupidity. They are not a place to comprehend—but to survive.

3.3 Azure Isles

It is far from the moody silence of the Great Wastes that you find a land awash in sunshine and lulled to sleep by the tide—The Azure Isles, a sapphire-soaked sesame of emerald islands.

But beneath the surface is not a watery lullaby.

For all these islands glitter with a golden light, they carry secrets under cover of their shimmering sea. Each points as headlander its true north at a gone-away god, whispering through coral caves, from ridges of the east cliff with all such other ominous signals for wind; and that which floats about Rimepeaked or back westward across stares up begging some underworld word.

A long time ago when magic crossed the sky for first time and was the most skillful act in its history; here, under skywhales drifting between lazy circles of 52 and others fixed on tradition like memoNdodia, A widening ring of light congealed as if from thought crystals (wait where that means about to stopor over, quinarily). The Aeolian Monks created covered a void with sanctuaries made out of air itself. They say that their songs are light enough to span oceans—and sharp enough so as cut storms in two.

Now the Archipelago is splitting. It's not a split of body, but spirit.

- Coastal feudal states squabble over 54)) the right of successorship to treasures lying somnambulant just below glassy waters.
- Ancient leviathans once venerated now shift uneasily under waves, their lullabies tinged with disquiet.
- And high above, the once-quiet sky lanes are clogged with whispercrafts—silent ships carrying a cargo of spies, smugglers and star-bound pilgrims.

But amidst the chaos, there's still beauty. Vine-draped observatories continue to cut off star-fall with their ink-flecked fingers. Children play games that are older than the islands themselves on wind spirits. And if you're ever silent at dusk, you might catch it—a flute song rolling in on fog from all corners or nowhere.

To travel the Azure Isles is not so much a journey to somewhere as it is a letting go, a dreaming and on occasion, disappearing.

3.4 Realm of Eternal Night

Said the name is almost chilling. The Kingdom where night is eternal, where daylight is no more than a myth uttered through lips that tremble. And stars do not wink; instead, they stare down at you.

Given that it is shrouded in the never-ending twilight of a sunless equinox, filled with the abyss, this land is much more than a mere piece of territory; it is a disorder that runs through the very heart of the world, cold memories and ancient sins pulsating beneath the surface. The sky is low here; it droops under a mourning veil of soft purple and brushes the mountaintops like velvet. Should the light come upon this land, it will shatter into shards against the snow-blackened obsidian at its feet, and wither between twisted moons.

No birds are singing. No wind stirs. Just the rumble of giants asleep underneath the crust, and the hiss of figures wrapped in cloaks signing symbols into ash.

Before the Age of Runes, their pact with darkness was made by this land. It is not fire or steel that rules the land of the Obsidian Synod, an order as ancient as silence itself, but with strange names, forgotten truths, and forbidden. They recall the world's entreaties to put things out of mind.

At last, time is confused. Travelers conversing among themselves to stretch the time one hour would stretch their feet; they look, but footprints are not there just one minute ago, and lullabies are sung backwards in a foreign tongue. Souls do not find rest in the Great Night's Realm; they reverberate.

But even in this shroud of gloom, life still festers—and it is resplendent in its defiance yet.

— Scholars chromatic as shadows with blood next to tallow beneath the bone of a cathedral vault

— Children as if from the box illusion and quicksilver brave

— And on the brink of madness, men transmute their dreams into towers of poetic glass and send them shrieking out into the storm.

To step foot upon this land is to run the risk of forgetting one's name, one's purpose, even one's shape. Still, some do—out of worldly desire, foretold fate, or retribution.

3.5 And some never, ever, leave.

4 History of Aeltas & Key Characters

“To walk the lands of Aeltas is to tread on history — buried beneath your boots, breathing between the trees, echoing in every ruined stone.”

4.1 Age of Dawn: The Primordial Birth (First Era)

In the fledgling hum of time's first breath, before a script bore any words or stars yet shone in space, Aeltas stood naked and rough. Time did not move forward in a straight line, but flowed and dripped in thick gold like sap. From beyond the vast hollows of space, The First Flame enkindled breath and life into rock. It was not blood that lived, but the vibration of life.

This was the time of the Elemental Titans, beings older than death who shaped the world. Myths tell that they sleep under mountains of great height, in deep trenches beneath the ocean floor. The First Wind came from their breath, the first rivers flowed from their tears. Civilization had not yet ventured on a name for itself.

4.1.1 Key Characters

- Sylthia, Goddess of Winds: Her blessing to Aelno was not born of kindness but of intrigue regarding mortal ambition. As humans became more proficient at wielding mana, the goddess withdrew from the mortal world and into Sky Tempests, leaving nothing behind except altars where people can worship her and cryptic prophecies.
- Velora, Sea God (Mythological Figure): The earliest inhabitants of Azure Isles worshiped her. In the legends, she calmed the endless storms and set the first ships free. Although invisible, her influence is said to still stir tides and tempests in modern times.
- The Silent King (Demigod): He ruled the Realm of Eternal Night with authority before it was sheared from our continuum. Half-buried in the black sands of Obsidian Wastes, his statues are mute witnesses showing how his rule helped shape that land when reality split. It was his silence that people said commanded dreams rather than armies.

4.2 Rune Age: Magic's Awakening (Second Era)

The Runes exhaled even as the world inhaled—inscriptions etched not by hand, but by pure will. Magic did not fall from the sky; it erupted, banging sounds of chaos and wonder.

The ancient races, who once were only onlookers to a titanic sleep, now knew how to reach things not seen and inscribe might in the earth, air, or bone.

In this time ascended the fabulous Queen Seren Valen, a daughter of storm and sacrifice who carved the first Rift Sigil into the obsidian of the world's receipt. Her government was bound together not by blood, but by rune—loyalists stapled to the rock of renewal in glyphs and vows. She disappeared beneath the earth on the eve of the Crimson Eclipse, leaving in the sealed storerooms of Ren the Leymark Crown, which is still humming today.

4.2.1 Key Characters

- King Kaseros III: Originally a blacksmith's son, Kaseros utilized rune magic to unify ravaged tribes. His empire, the Runic Concord, controlled much of the continent of Ren. A control fanatic, he commanded that citizens be branded with runes on their forearms as a mark of loyalty. Growing paranoid, Kaseros thought his generals were plotting to kill him and finished his life with a "Silent Feast" in which his closest advisors participated in his assassination.

- The Split Twins: After Kaseros' death, his two children, Veylen and Kaeth, an interior civil war erupted, and each claimed their own legitimacy. Veylen established the Iron Crown in the West, following a path of militarized rune technology. Kaeth started the Eastern Scriptorium, pursuing enchantments and magic-academia offices based upon runes embedded in the product. For over three centuries, their descendants continued the "Rune Wars," dividing the empire winds.
- The Dreambound Order: Founded in the late Rune Age, this sect of priests wanted to enter dreams and talk with the sleeping demigods in the Realm of Eternal Night. Thinking they could reshape reality merely by dreaming it, the Dreambound established monasteries that seemed to exist half in the world of the senses and half in thought. Their final destiny is unknown.

4.3 Magi-Tech Age: The Rise and Fracture (Third Era)

However, Ye Wenli dare not shamefully track down information about what became of him after 75 years. The Ethereal Skyfortresses and Spell-bound Railroads which have emerged from Glorio's smelting houses, as well as its own automatons, had all their parts etched with powerful runes (inside their bodies), making them execute single tasks yet exist personally, altogether constituting a completely new form of engineering capable of feats unimaginable even a short while ago.

Certainly, some few years ago, what had once been the unobtrusive build of White Tower now became a towering structure of rational magic; it was half due to logic and half born through sorcery. The smoldering ambition distorts their thoughts like a specter looming overhead with dire import.

'The Crimson Pact' secretly bore fruit for rebels and seasoned mutineers alike: three strange and directionless Mana Engines, which sucked the leylines dry as if they were nothing more than bitten apples.

Their experiments caused the balance to break. The Esoris Calamity struck, a shockwave so violent that it cut through space. When this explosion came, the earth itself spewed forth fires, and Night Halos made of delicate Haïdar tea porcelain were in pieces. For a few survivors, it is only silence.

4.3.1 Key Characters

- Ria Dawnbreak: Last descendant of a royal line shattered by war, she strives hard to resurrect Glorium as one state. With piercing eyes that seem to light the whole world up and wearing a magnificent silver suit of armor, Ria wants nothing more than to have reason live along with magic in a compatible world peace. Even the troubles faced at the player's hands in the beginning now become hers to narrate in full story.
- Yuris Crowe: Reared in Nightcrow Assembly circles, Yuris embodies cold pragmatism. Bearing the scars of espionage and betrayal, on Fighting Street below there is not even one source of loyalty he can trust, but gradually he and the Player bond under such mutual suffering.
- Aevya: Born in the White Tower Sanctuary, her talent is to communicate with the Old Gods, which led to Aevya's isolation. The strongest part of this spiritual story consists of the hearth fire in her heart formed by combined faith and self-satisfaction.

- Dain: Jovial and perpetually curious, Dain is the chief engineer of the Iron Guild. Once he served as a weapons designer for the Stellar Council, a fact that still haunts him. He compensates for this through humor and dedication.
- Zeran the Regent: The man behind the Stellar Council's rising. At one time a scholar, he was so opposed to divine chaos that he eliminated all religion. Priests were replaced by machines. His plan is to remove mana from existence, so that everything may be built on the basis of psi coding instead.
- Esoris the Fallen God: In legend, Esoris was "Under Sand and Voice," a god buried in Silent Wastes after the Dawn Time. Now awakening, Esoris warps truth and sips Mt. Mana as though the god has turned business. To those players who drift into disease-corrupted areas, its ghost will appear.
- High Priestess Elna Veleri: Known as the uniter of the early Magi-Tech period at Azure Isles. After years of summoner clan wars, she led her people to worship Velora and brought magi-tech infrastructure to the Isles without disruption from any lingering traits. Now her Coral Throne stands before us as a sign that developments apparently unite with faith.
- The Corpse Seekers: Breaking away from Nightcrow Assembly after an insurrection, this renegade faction is obsessed with the structure of deities. They believe that by taking bones from the desolate wasteland, they can forge new god-killing weapons. Their very being embodies the most sinister side of human ambition.
- Sons of Decay: The Sons of Decay, a group of nihilistic individuals who worship Heckorist. The world has told them it's necessary to destroy, and within chaos, there is only potential for new growth—how that might come about is really all that matters. Through fields of waste within the uncinnabar crimson deserts, they hasten the Revival of The Fallen God by infernal rites. Throughout Alaiderrus, their pocked flesh and blades of tendon are a horror to behold.

4.4 Starlight Era: Aetas in Waiting (Fourth era: Predicted Future)

Now, the stars overhead Aeltas are uneasy, flashing and twinkling randomly. What was a fixed constellation now goes adrift. The ley lines are pale points of light. Small whispers begin in cities risen from ruins, "The Rift and unrest begin to wake again."

The Stellar Council keeps the peace. Thoughts grow dark amongst the various nations. The White Tower becomes more and more withered. The Crimson Pact slinks about in shadows. Nobody openly admits they bear such a mark.

And always, the ley lines hum.

4.4.1 Key Character

- Saipher, Starlit Oracle: Not male nor female, Saipher appears from time to time. It is swathed in a robe like starmaps. The Wheel of Eternity - this is Saipher's eternal message. It hints that Aeltas is only one among many worlds. Saipher's manipulations are few and far between, but always their effects are major.

Aeltas does not forget. It dreams. And in its dreaming, it remembers.

5 Cultural Systems & Factions

5.1 Empire of Glorium – The Sovereign Flame

“All light bends to Glorium. All roads return to the Flame.”

In the heart of Rein Continent lies Glorium: a citadel of marble and edict, where dawn lasts forever and endless golden flags courthouse glimmers in the sun rising. The Empire of Glorium is not just a name or kingdom, but something given form by heartfelt conviction. Begun under the twilight of Rune Age and forged by the hellstorm of civil chaos, Glorium may have emerged as nothing less than a political behemoth. Yet it became something holy, its Divine Flame Doctrine a blazing beacon on high.

Like a sermon carved in stone, their capital – Caelestis – is a city built in concentric circles, with the Imperial Basilica at its center ever inflamed by sanctified fire. It is here, this very spot, where the Radiant Sovereign rules from: monarch and messiah in one skin or so they say. He is said to have received that hope-promoting flame since he was born. We live in a deeply hierarchical and sanctified society. Warriors, priests, and wizards of flame are its three-fold power.

Its armies are clad in sunsteel. Their war cries have the ring of a sermon. To its adherents, conquest means purification. To its enemies, salvation by sword. Critics mutter darkly about heresy trials, relic-collecting expeditions, and bonfires lit under cloudless skies – but none deny the Empire’s organization, unity, and majesty.

5.2 Stellar Council – The Architects of Equilibrium

“Stars do not rule. They align.”

In the twilight horizons of the Azure Islands, on the tides of a tempered logic as refracted into the unknown by moonlight, the Stellar Council operates as a kind of galactic compass. They are a decentralized federation not unlike an empire in that there is constant.

The Stellar Covenant: scholars, stargazers, and timeweavers. Apart, no one knows the reasons; it’s simply taken on faith that their crumbling atolls have stood thus for centuries from time beyond counting.

The Council was formed in the wake of the Magi-Tech Age as a response to unchecked divine zealotry and chaotic magicks, born out of the wreckage of the old Arcanum and dead Rune Sects. Its halls are scintillating crystal towers scattered across the Lunaris Atoll—feed think-tanks, fortunated enemies for strategic chaining-up of camps. No more alone than they don’t much even precede their prey. Counselor Elders rarer and voices soft: While they do not wander through their land, Astra was regularly on taint computer code.

Technology, magic, and logic mingle loosely. They invented and resettled Mana Calibration Rings, re-engineered Leystone Weavers, made the Clockwork Treaty to control time-altering enchantments among Hey and so not theirs. Their greatest thrill is foresight; their greatest sin is disengagement.

While some rush after glory or gods, the Stellar Council chases the convergence—a prophesied moment when leyline, logic, and destiny will all be in harmony. Whether the predictions will mean good or ill remains to be seen.

5.3 Sanctuary of the White Tower – The Keepers of Bound Knowledge

“Truth is light. Light must be veiled.”

Perched on the floating spires of Serethar, a city-bastion dangling from forgotten rites and ley-bound anchors, the White Tower looms detached, white-washed — and dangerously quiet. It is more than a tower: it is a philosophy imprisoned in ivory and spellglass, where silence is holiness, and wisdom is holy fire.

Established in the Rune Age by exile-magi who weathered the Cataclysm of Graying Sky, the Sanctuary is both lockbox and vanguard, protecting esoteric relics, proscribed grimoires, and elder secrets it is unsafe ever to speak aloud. The Order itself is fragmented into Circles: the initiates at the outer Acolytes to the inner Ascendants who don mirrored masks to both hide their identity as well as their intentions.

They believe in Custodial Neutrality — the idea that esoteric facts must be guarded and passed on — but only disclosed when the world has been shown to be capable of it. They’ve ended wars on their knees, rewritten magical laws, even arranged the quiet collapse of fragile factions.

Rumors say that within the White Tower remains a living splinter of the First Spell, that the vault of descent sealed beneath it is alive and undulating, with the pre-dawn universe’s ebb and flow.

5.4 Crimson Pact – The Broken Oath Reforged

“Blood remembers. Blood binds. Blood burns.”

The Pact is not a kingdom, but a scar. Its historical past is one of blood, betrayal, and civil war.

Born from rebellion against the Glorium Creed and cast into the obsidian gulches of the Silent Wastes, The Pact of Destiny is a covenant of exiles, heretics, and warlords who swore never to kneel again, surely so long as blood still washes over their crushed, tired minds. What started as a loose militia of outcasts has grown into a martial theocracy, where loyalty is inked in blood and life is sanctified.

Its ruling body, the Red Synod, includes seers and commanders who have elaborate scars on their bodies due to ritual burns, tattoos for ancestral recall, and the Ash Sigil—or a flesh mark constituting their vow. The Scourgeborn, their warriors, channel wild fury through controlled blood magic and age twice as fast as a result, dying three times quieter with each body part struck.

Long ago, no banners flew over the lands of the Pact. Only braziers, bone totems, and ruins torn apart by storms survive. Yet none but the most brave, or foolish, cross into its territory: for though in tatters, the Pact endures. Every pledge shredded by the old world is recovered through their ceremonies. Those who lost it all, they offer as sacrifice in the entrance hall of this desolate cosmos.

They do not seek dominion. Their philosophy is one of refusal, a time both has been and will soon be ended.

5.5 Nightcrow Assembly – The Twilight Republic

“In the dark, we see.”

The Nightcrow Assembly hides within the thick veil of the Gloomshade Expanse, while the average person sees only shadow. In place of kings, councils, or dogma is this elusive group of agents, druids, former assassins, and something called fungal engineers; they believe in decentralizing knowledge, whispers not intentions, and a philosophy that would use concealment as its ethos.

The Assembly works in masks, votes, and spores. Names should take a backseat to deeds. Matters of council are decided in Murkmoots: gathering smoke-filled rooms, their mood is everything but clear. Myco-Nets function as fungal neural networks that link these masks.

The Assembly’s capital – if you want to say it has one – is Veymire Hollow: a metropolis of fungi where iridescent trees grow compounded with bio-luminescent bark.

They rule the unseen: espionage, subversion, and more terrifying yet, disease. Foreigners may call them crazy or anarchistic. Better do the insiders know that beneath the moss and creeping, Nightcrow Assemblage is a forest with a thousand eyes always watching.

When things begin to teeter, they don’t strike from strength but from absence.

5.6 Iron Guild – The Silent Industry

“We forge, therefore we remain.”

The Iron Guild toils in rhythm like reflex. At the junction of the Ashfang Mountain ranges, rivers hiss out from molten veins, and every single gear grinds away 24 hours per day. It does not belong to any state or kingdom. It can be called a mechanistic treaty—the sovereign union of the forgemaster, technomancer, and cogwright who all think that efficiency is virtue.

It is governed by the Tri-Cogs Tribunal, three master artisans who collectively represent Function, Innovation, and Control. They wear no crowns—only hands grown calloused from their work and clothing which is permanently stained by soot. Here the currency is not gold but effort tokens, won through labor and recorded for automated retrieval by beasts called Ledgerhounds.

Instead of being built, guild cities are issued out from concentric circles. With each new ring welded to the old, the smell of molten metal and the sound of steam fill the air. The soft rustle from the environment and the only people speaking are those whom God has raised in His appenders—church choirs made of real silver or brass but not quite brass yet—and that by definition old enough to have lost all memory about a time when brass was still worth something of length.

They mostly keep quiet, but when the gears move the world listens.

5.7 Nomads of Dawn – The Echoes Unbound

“The road remembers more than the city ever could.”

Before maps and walls, music. They still sing those songs today.

Driven by rhythms and not by need, the Azure Road steppers and Wind Riders of Harthuel dash through high mountain gorges and clover-covered plains. They are guided by ancestral drumbeats written in the wind, oral prophecy, and stars.

With music as their guide, all their culture is wandering. It is inscribed in totems men hollow out from old light, and flows tattooed on them in flame; while it is also a memory-flecked trail sung from aged to child. They believe the world is still being sculpted with each journey, and that the “footfall” made here and there is just as much a part of basic carving as any pilgrim’s work in stone.

The great walking cities they travel in—‘Moving Holds’—are drawn by beasts of flesh-and-spirit design. Their leading figures are partly soothsayer, partly map-maker: Pathcallers who can sense the lay of the land in terms of both rifts and blessings.

Others ridicule them as anachronisms. But they are nomads; and if the leylines fracture while skies sear (as everyone knows), a fortress itself cannot avoid annihilation: it is only the caravan that survives.

5.8 Summary – The Fractured Balance

Each faction of Aeltas is more than geography — it is a response.

While Glorium Empire holds sway, Stellar Council looks for patterns. The White Tower hides the truth; the Crimson Pact trades blood for it. Nightcrows vanish to root and legend; Iron Guilds cast permanence from entropy. But nomads? They move without a trace, never staying still, never remembering anything.

But what they do comprise makes the shaken-out compass of Aelts: seven divergent paths each convinced that all the others must be lost. It is everyone who has not yet wakened up to realize that they are, after all, just various facets of a single scar—crossing over history, faith, and fear.

When fissures open in time, alliances shift. Old word-of-mouth should reverberate even more than before. And the world tilts again.

6 Technology & Magic – Time Definition

Aeltas is a world where magic and technology are inseparable, shaping every aspect of civilization. It is an era of magi-tech in which mankind realizes that it can amplify or redirect natural occurrences to serve its purposes, within scientific and practical limits. These last two power words are the markers of change, and because mankind jacquards of modeling their own body movements into code, in this future society is not walking as before but sprinting. The current era is the Magi-Tech Age.

6.1 Core Features of the Magi–Tech Era

“Aeltas did not choose between wand and wire — it chose both.”

The Magi–Tech Era is a wondrous and dissonant age, forged at the crossroads of spellcraft and circuitry. In the capital city of Celtica, it has been so long since anyone actually saw the stars. Towers hum with magnetic runes. Streets gleam with bioluminescent glyphs. Cities breathe as much mana as they do coal smoke.

6.1.1 Hybrid Infrastructure

Crystal reactors. Rune-welded steel. Hover sleds pulled by tethered artificial spirits. Life in the city reef lived off an ascending pulse of technology and incantation.

Next to turbines, there are magelamps that pulse with enchanted light. Ley-lines run under seagoing lengths of ferroconcrete. This is where the bones of a society in fact run not with blood but on pumped methyl.

6.1.2 Arcane Engineering

Golems with programmable minds patrol arcane foundries. Summoned animals wear mana converters like dog tags.

This is a world of solder smoke and light the color of aether. Here—engineering and conjuring kiss.

6.1.3 Ley-Circuit Networks

Ley-lines were no longer wild, but spun into arcs and lattices. This was the brilliant artery of the continent. With them came mindform transmissions, signs that walked beside you through the air, on a few occasions teleportation. A deathless god's soul in machinery of mandala mind.

6.1.4 Mana as Industry

Mana instead of gold. Refineries distilled it. Sailing through the skies as a buffer against ambient aether. Ley-drills bored deep for founts. From then on mana was to be had on credit, and every dealer held a monopoly.

6.1.5 Biotech Ascension

Bio-magitech blossomed. - Rune-silk, spider-woven capes. - Blades with heartbeats. - Buildings that whispered weather warnings.

The era of making flesh into magic, and machines into life; and often, into a terrible price.

---

This was Aeltas's Magi-Tech Era.

A time of wonder. A time of fracture. A time that never quite ended.

6.2 A World of Contrasts

Every country will not be delivered by the same tactics. Outside the magic-tech cities, with the bright spires and humming ley-rings, the rural heartland of Aeltas still beats to other rhythms. It is stubborn, sacred, and slow to change.

- Farmers in Aeltas carve ancient symbols into ploughshares and wells, sourcing from history rather than innovation.
- The Azure Isles are buffeted by wind-stormers who come from the island, chant old weather tunes longing for thunder and lightning but disdaining as abominations mere mechanical precision.
- The Nomads of Dawn still find their way by ancient instincts running like water through their veins, rejecting the rational postures and developmental models of the current age.

Of course, many places are not yet crammed into the pigeonholes of modern cartography.

Where technology is abandoned, religion yet survives. In between the stones of the fields and the more secret places of the forest, mystics still move, throwing doubt over the wonders man has achieved in urban areas.

A member of the Stellar Council is able to influence probability merely by exercising his mind. Yet in some villages, he would be hated; the elders will have none of him, for they listen only to the voices issued from bone priests.

6.3 A Living Age of Wonders

To reside in the Magi-Tech Age was to live inside a miracle.

- It is an iron heart that pumps mana through armored engines, and writers spout scripture from the tips of their silver pens—with this wave after wave of delight upon us all.

You teach us too much, LEEUWENHOEK! Recovered and updated rune etchings gleam with glittering essence like some golden natural perfume.

- At the edge of the mountain, lavish sculptures and fountains of living water arise like perennials.
  - Salvage: A city of gold forged with circuit and charm that debates ethics in the bustling Agoras of Glorium.

Every dawn brought its wonders. Every evening left the world with a new myth.

This is an age where the impossible is not only real—it's routine.

6.4 Otherworldly Beauty is Erased by Dawn.

7 Character Classes & Ascension Trials

7.1 Warrior

Authorities hold the warrior's true story to commence long before clashing swords or the entertainment found today in clouds of dust. Below the surface here is an oath, perhaps never once spoken but never yet broken. Unlike other fighting men, they are trained to self-discipline and shaped not simply by death. Some are veterans with long scars, their tales older than the wars they fight; others are young recruits, their eyes glowing with ancestral swords and tomorrow's hopes. But all know one thing: to have strength is also to have responsibility—to help the weak, to bring order out of chaos, and to stand up against the dark.

7.2 The Magician

But the magician was much more than a pupil in magic spells; he was also a spinner of unseen threads. Their brains, packed with innumerable forgotten languages and assorted arcane spells, are the place where no thoughts too dangerous can rest. In pale-bowed towers, in corners that smoke, they write their theories in ink, flame, or pure thought. Every spell is a question one answers; every written line is a door to worlds once thought beyond one's reach. Yet power has a price. Some are lost in their own creations; still others become sacred—expanding beyond the everyday and the enigmatic, surrounded by starlight and mist.

7.3 Pastor

But not all light is like the moon's. Clerics are intermediaries between the world of gods and that of men. They mediate divine power to heal, bless, or destroy. Their garments are steeped with prophetic powers and glitter with trustfulness: that walk so many feared embarking upon, with naught in front of them really except faith. They utter desolation itself against destiny and these prayers are not tender murmurs at all. Going into battle under protection or perseverance in subterranean catacombs which the world right now only half-remembers driving off nameless monsters, clerics have a long and perilous path to travel which is both completely sacred and lonely. Often however, though much quieter than the dull roar of their faith.

7.4 A Personalized Journey

In Aeltas, there are no standard models for heroes. A blacksmith's son might one day order the very sky above him, and one day an aristocrat's heir would uncover his ancestral origins far back in a hermit's cave. Every choice speaks to Destiny, and every friend is a three-year curse; all betrayal, hurt, miracle magnified or marked by our triumphs and disasters on the beast called Life. Progress followed by setbacks, easy victories and hard-won wins. It is also here that the beauty of our world lies: You make your own path completely. One moment a tale spun out in starlight and ages of shadows turning, the next—catastrophe!

8 The Story: A Player's Journey

8.1 Prologue – Ashes of Faith

When the earth would whisper in the hollows of the cathedrals and skyships flew above smoldering ruins, Aeltas held her breath. Temples fell apart, empires crumbled, and somewhere inside the dust—half-forgotten faith smoldered like embers.

In among this silence came a voice on the wind: not ending, but a settlement. You are born into this silence, not yet a savior, but just a soul bound to choice.

8.2 Act I – Fractured Alliances

It all begins with a misstep—or betrayal even. The former supports of civilization have become at swords' points. Composed of ephemera and memories hidden within arcane veils, White Tower conceals the secret; that includes stanchion of Corsica gains dominion for the glory out glory. And bleeding just like promises in ink, blood alike are the pact of crimson. As borders blur into battlefields and common purpose sours to mutual distrust, the player is cast into the whirlwind of ideals, allegiance, and betrayal. Who can you trust when truth wears a thousand masks?

8.3 Act II – The Return of the Fallen God

Under moonlit spires of the Azure Isles and found once the fallen Vaults He Halls Of Eternal Night, the Old Ones stir. Prophecies once dismissed as madmen’s raving now drip with dread and portent. No longer affronted, the Fallen God now the hungering. With every corrupt breath it takes, the world itself groans from within. Armies march being backed up not only by swords but also doubts. Still, the player must decide—stand against the falling fate with valor, wheedle an accord in shadows roadside where apocalypse is born also or descend into the same.

8.4 Act III – The Last Dawn

The final chapter is never engraved in ink—it is carved with choice.

- Divine Ending: In astral flames you rise from Earth to celestial heights. Gone is the mortal state; only now are you judgment incarnate. The Seraphim burst forth. She’s not here to save but to bring justice.
  - Machine Ending: In the metallic corridors of Sanctimony, you spit wisdom into the wheels of Eternuity. There are no gods. There is no myths. Just logic, polished through sacrifice.
  - Balance Ending (Titan Eins): Few find the path that lies between two extremes. Fewer can survive its tests. In embracing contradiction, you will make worlds anew, neither saved nor damned, but recast.

8.5 Epilogue – A New Age Begins

The ripples of your choices spread outwards—through time, through memory, and in the whispers of every green blade telling his story. Cities rise out of ruins left behind and songs are sung in new tongues. Children gather under starlit skies to ask one another—was it really so?

They will never know. But you will.

9 Immersion through Visuals

9.1 Language as Scenery

Aeltas’s scenery does more than just provide a backdrop for backdrops. It whispers and roars; it glows and fades. Cracked banners flutter tattered on black towers, each embroidered with lost crests which spring feebly back to life at night and then die beneath moonlight. Forests change their color en masse with the seasons, while the whole sky—oh the whole sky every day at least—paints itself with dreams of clouds or storms, or starlight stories. But the stories are all there, hidden around every bend; in the desert wastes of the Sun, or along the iridescent peaks of the White Tower.

9.2 Sounds of a Living World

Silence is a stranger in Aeltas. A realm so full of life that the very winds seem to hum with ancient tunes. The bugs in the marshes of Mirehaven chirp to a rhythm almost uncanny; there is the clank of distant fireworks in Glorium that echo like heartbeats from a world that needs rest. First sound reaches through narrow lanes whose edges produce different voices, some of them human—all of them disreputable; but even trees talk together at night as though they had secrets only druids might understand.

9.3 Dynamic Responses in the HomePage

To step into a thunderstorm and feel its magic is to sense the air pulse around you. Cracks seal shut before icicles can fall from a Cryomancer's boots; lamps flicker when a psion walks nearby. The environment does not just react; it anticipates. A careless fire spell might ignite the wooden stalls in the city market, bringing water spirits that put out flames. Like a corrupted relic's own shadow, it lengthens; and flowers grow up in its own vicinity when a priest passes by. Aeltas is interactive, reactive, and very much alive.

9.4 Every Step Is True

No stride is too small to matter. The ground crunches beneath armored soles, while sand shifts beneath the soles of wandering serfs. A rain of drops on capes cloth from the metal below them is barely louder than a whisper; but it whispers as in long grass. Even a jump upward from cliffside to rooftop resonates with such weight that it cannot escape notice. And every step, whether on the crystal bridges of Stellar Sanctum, or skulking through Iron Guild's sewers underneath its belly, is tailored to feel—and remind the player—that s/he is not merely playing, but living another life in Aeltas.

10 Conclusion

Aeltas is not a digital world; Aeltas lives, it breathes, it pulses, and remembers. This is not an inanimate tapestry; it's a living epic spattered with memories of dead gods, woven through by the cilia of sleeping machines and heady from incense stacks of ancient prayers.

Under every rusty gear is a piece of the rebellion. Beneath every runed city is an under-note of power. Not only by tectonic violence do mountains grow, but also were they forged magnificent to the carved myths/mythologies of men. And when a player actually steps across that line, the world listens.

10.1 The Living Soul of Heroes

Characters in Aeltas are not meant to simply be – Characters ache, rail, and they grow. Their pale flesh is history, their starved scars holy text.

- Rune Warriors: Rune tattoos flare when they use their Honda techniques to peel back the layers of reality, revealing hidden truths.
- Mages speak with the unknown, communicating back to wind and fire, pulling hidden truths from storms that could drown common sense.

- Clerics (silence bagged, miracle blessed) are servants of gods that may never hear; they pray nonetheless.

These are not classes; they're destinies sewn in flesh and fire.

10.2 Factions: Not Flags but Foundations

The factions of the world are not just superficial camps. They are cathedrals of belief and cauldrons of strife. No matter if you tread the ash-streaked lanes of the Iron Guild, kneel before crystalline spires in White Tower, or roam starlit nomadic rites amidst Eternal Night—the place where you stand makes its mark.

Every loyalty whispers a question:

- Will you shatter the gods or meet your fate as man?
- Will you resurrect the lost magics and rouse a sleeping world?

Or craft your own heretical path, interlacing progress and piety into something perilously new?

10.3 Slack A Canvas Dripping Fresh Paint

Aeltas offers no answers. It offers choice. It offers consequence. The world is not done; its sentences await your punctuation.

Each broken idol, every whispered incantation heals each morsel of mana in your gear-forged heart. You aren't just looting ruins — you resurrect them. You don't play a quest – you write it.

You do not simply play Aeltas.

You become it.
